A village green is a common open area within a village or other settlement. Historically, a village green was common grassland with a pond for watering cattle and other stock, [citation needed] often at the edge of a rural settlement, used for gathering cattle to bring them later on to a common land for grazing. [citation needed] Later, planned greens were built into the centres of villages.

The main line of reference remains between the traditional English IPA vs. American IPA (and its sub styles). I personally gravitate towards the English IPA, but I do appreciate the New England style American IPA and the Brett fermented varieties popular as of late. Chris is a huge fan of the juicy New England style and Session IPAs.
